This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

PROEM.

IT is one of the advantages of a collection of portraits that we are induced to inquire about the lives of the men and women whose effigies we see, and learn therefrom the hidden springs and wheels that have been at work in moving and ordering this great clock of ours.

We can do this at home, simply by the aid of engraving; which gives us, as our own property, to be used as we please, nearly all the advantages—except those attached to color—to be found in the picture-gallery or the miniature-room. The expression which color conveys cannot always be relied upon; therefore, engravings are not at such a disadvantage compared with paintings or miniatures as we might hastily assume. Besides the "flattering" tints put on by the painter, his sitter might be, and often was, guilty of a previous painting.

Color, then, is deceptive, and perhaps more deceptive than hard lines; but when it may be depended on, what a tale it tells! As Donne said of a happy and virtuous lady:

> . . . . "We understood
> Her by her sight; her pure and eloquent blood
> Spoke in her cheeks, and so distinctly wrought
> That one might almost say her body thought."

39 X 688

Irrespective, then, of color, which in a picture is generally the most false or flattered part of the likeness, a good engraving is almost as desirable as a good oil-painting or miniature.

In speaking of the portrait collection his friend Pepys was anxious to form, Evelyn says: "I should not advise a solicitous expense of having the pictures painted in oyle," and so he goes on to recommend "heads and effigies in taille douce" (or engravings); and says: "Some are so well done to the life that they may stand in competition with the best paintings. This were a cheape and so much a more useful curiosity, as they seldom are without their names, ages, and elogies of the persons whose portraits they represent. I say you will be exceedingly pleased to contemplate the effigies of those who have made such a noise and bustle in the world, either by their madnesses and folly, or a more conspicuous figure by their wit and learning." Although to Evelyn and Ashmole and Pepys must perhaps be ascribed the honor of forming the earliest large collections of engraved portraits in England, they were certainly not the first who had done so. Many of the portraits collected by the Earl of Pembroke, principally as studies in physiognomy, were engravings formed into books; and about the same time were published in volumes the series of portraits known as the "Baziliologia, or Book of Kings," and the "Heroologia," containing martyrs, naval heroes, etc.

At this time, also, it was frequently the practice to prefix a portrait of the author of a work to his book, if his fame seemed to call for it; and this custom became, later, quite general, until, in the Seventeenth century, scarcely a pamphlet or sermon appeared without a portrait as a frontispiece. In the Eighteenth century these prints were often cut out of books and placed in portfolios, forming collections of portraits similar to those coveted by Evelyn and Pepys; and then appeared the work of Granger, his celebrated "Biographical History of England," describing all the engraved portraits he could see or hear of, and giving short and pithy notices of the persons represented.

To collect all the portraits that have ever been engraved is, of course, a hopeless task; and there would necessarily be so many important hiatuses that no one probably nowadays would enter on the undertaking. Yet, in the days of Granger, it was attempted; and it must have been an exciting occupation, too serious for amusement or recreation, for the several collectors, who then all ran for the same goal, to outdo and outbid each other in forming their collections. It is astonishing how interesting a collection of a more limited range may be made. Walpole's "Royal and Noble Authors" or Lodge's "Memoirs" are more readable than the "Biographia Britannica" or "Bayle's Dictionary"; and two or three folios of portraits of a particular class, or of a particular era, well arranged and annotated, may be made much more amusing, recreative, and interesting than dozens of cabinets filled with a miscellaneous assemblage of portraits of people of all sorts. As a good poet is great in the "art to blot," the collector must learn the art to omit. He should select some book, or some era, or some class, to illustrate with portraits, and elucidate and ornament with notes, and then try to make that as perfect as he can. A well-arranged tiara of a few gems is more attractive than the whole miscellaneous contents of a lapidary's drawer. Of course he will select a subject in which he may take an interest; but, whatever subject he takes up, he will find its interest grow, and he will have no need to "feign a relish till a relish come."

Granger has a class of "Remarkable or Eccentric Characters," in which he includes such persons as either Mr. Richardson or Mr. Barnum would have been glad to have seen in their shows at Bartholomew Fair or New-York. And some of these people are wonders in their way, and were as much so in days past as they would be at the present time. Mistress Barbara Vanbeck was certainly a greater prodigy as a hairy lady than Madame Pastrina; and Blondin, who has been patronized by millions, was outdone in the time of Cromwell by the Turk, or rather the "Funamble Turk," of whom Evelyn discourses.

It is not absolutely necessary to select a work to be illustrated. The collector may himself make a book, by collecting some series of portraits, as of statesmen, poets, actors, etc., etc., of some particular period, and place opposite to each a few salient biographical paragraphs. A few dates might be given, as of birth, death, etc.; but no attempt need be made to furnish a full biography. It should be endeavored rather to heighten our interest in the portrait by recalling or recording a few anecdotes than to attempt to vie with a biographical dictionary. Just as, in passing along a gallery of portraits, or noticing those in a great house, we pause not only to criticise the figure, or the complexion and expression of the face, but to remark such and such an event in the life of him or her who is before us. What is wanted in such notes is not a serious biography of the individual, but a few special facts and dates, some short characteristic anecdotes not generally met with in biographies, but to be picked up in "Mémoires pour servir" and similar ana. For instance, everybody knows the "historical" first William Pitt and the Duke of Newcastle; but the "History of England" scarcely presents them so vividly before us, "in their habits as they lived," as their portraits and a few chatty words from Horace Walpole about them.

Something similar to the inscriptions or notes required to a collection of portraits is Rossi's "Pinacotheca," a curious collection of biographical portraits in miniature. The best models of the kind, however, notwithstanding some defects, are Walpole and Granger.

The first great or systematic collectors of engraved portraits in England were Evelyn and Pepys, the former having the priority. It was not until about 1668 that Pepys began collecting portraits, getting many of Nanteuil, etc., from France, and being helped with the advice of Evelyn, as well as with specimens from his collection. In 1669 he went to France, and doubtless collected there many things (which are now in the Pepysian Library) on the recommendation of his friend, who says in one of his letters at that period printed by Lord Braybrooke: "They will greatly refresh you in your study, and by your fireside, when you are many years returned."

Yes, they will indeed refresh you. This is one of the great charms of such reminiscences of travel, that when you come home you are constantly traveling again in looking over sketches, pictures, and books. You see an engraving of the "Madonna della Sedia," and away you are at once, quicker than the telegraph, to Florence the Fair, and to that sunny day, when crossing the Arno by the Ponte Vecchio, you first came to the Palazzo Pitti, and, passing by wonders and wonders of art, you stopped at last by the Raffaelle, and forgot the world, absorbed by that which is indeed "a joy forever." In the same way you turn over a folio of portraits. Here are Elizabeth, Leicester, Raleigh, Shakspeare, Melville, and Mary of Scots—and you walk about London, Greenwich, Stratford, and Edinburgh, and visit the world of 300 years ago. Or you take up a folio of a later period, where you find Charles the Second, Buckingham, Rochester, Grammont, Sedley, Killigrew, York, Clarendon, Dryden, Lely, Castlemaine, Stewart, Nelly, and the Queen—and you are dining at one o'clock with the learned Mr. Evelyn and the wondrous Pepys, talking and telling anecdotes (with a good deal of relish) of the bad goings on of those times, A. D. 1666. Or, whisking out another folio, you rush off to Sir Joshua Reynolds', and laugh and criticise, mourn and moralize, with Goldsmith, Johnson, Burke, and Garrick, and think of Hogarth "over the way," and of Chesterfield, Walpole, the Gunnings, Kitty Clive, and Nelly O'Brien; and you may then take down an "illustrated" copy of Irving's "Life of Washington," and here we have Pater Patriæ, Franklin, André, Burgoyne, Arnold, Cornwallis, Braddock, Putnam, Hamilton, Burr, and the other shining stars of our Revolutionary History, and many more who have, unconsciously to themselves and to us, moved the world a step more forward. These are among the charms, the pleasures, and advantages of a collection of portraits.

"Lord Camelford was one of the most notorious characters of his day —a desperate "bruiser" and duelist. His public character rendered him a nuisance to society. Priding himself on his superiority in pistol-practice, he sought quarrels on every possible occasion. His dress was such as to excite remark and observation, which he would consider an insult and justify a murder. He died as he had lived, a blood-thirsty monster. He sought to deprive a bosom friend of life—although he was conscious of the falsehood of his own assertions—solely because he wished to display his superiority as a shot, and endeavoured to sacrifice a companion whom he esteemed, for an abandoned woman whom he despised." —Dr. Millingen's "History of Duelling."

64 Carey, Ann. Mother of Edmund Kean. From a rare print.

"I shall form no theory upon a very doubtful question, but record simply that Ann Carey, said to have been one of Richardson's actresses, who figures as the assumed mother of Edmund Kean, to be the same Mrs. Carey (now engraved) and the only Mrs. Carey I have found in a considerable file of Richardson's announcements. She appears to have been one of the chief ladies, if not the chief, who was permanently attached to Richardson's company. Her portrait was engraved in a small medallion, with some care. The singular head-dress represented in it is not stage costume, but a form of lady's bonnet fashionable when the sketch was made."—Morley's "Memoirs of Bartholomew Fair."

90 Cruikshank, George. Ætat 28. Engraved by F. Halpin, from a Sketch made by himself, 1820.

"I have read of an ingenious gentleman who succeeded in cramming the Iliad into a nut-shell; and John Toole, in Peter Priggins, mentions a waiter at the Star Hotel, Oxford, who boasted that he was clever enough to pack a quart of wine into a pint decanter! But these seem minor feats when compared with the attempt to set forth upon this narrow page a hundredth part of what I think and feel about the genius and character of George Cruikshank." The performance kept the audience in a broad laugh from first to last."—London paper, Jan. 28th, 1846.

106 Denham, Lady. (Margaret Brooks, wife of Sir John Denham.) Engraved by S. Freeman, from the Original Painting by Sir Peter Lely, in the Gallery at Althorp.

"This lady makes a brief but a brilliant figure upon the canvas of Grammont. In other words, she is there introduced almost for the sake of ridiculing her husband, Sir John Denham, the famous poet, whose wife she became when she was only eighteen years of age, and when her husband was in his seventy-ninth year. A short time after she became lady of the bed-chamber to the Duchess of York, and sullied her reputation by her intrigues with the Duke. She was the beautiful Miss Brooks. The fruits of her marriage were only jealousy on the one part and indifference on the other; and her death is supposed to have been precipitated at Sir John's house, where she was confined, by poison. This engraving is doubtless the most faithful of those which have been executed of the subject." Thomas Frognall Dibdin's "Ades Althorpianæ."

Prints, 50 cents, on India paper, $1.50.

107 Dennis, John. Celebrated Dramatist and Critic. From an Original Sketch by Hogarth.

"The curious sketch from which this etching is made, I conjecture, is a rapid delineation from the life. It is after the style and manner of the various sketches which Hogarth traced for the characters in his greater works."

Prints, 50 cents. On India paper, $1.00.

110 Dickens, Charles. From a scarce Etching by H. K. Browne, 1837. The earliest portrait known of Dickens.

"A very remarkable portrait of Dickens was etched about 1837, with the signature 'Phiz' (Halbot K. Browne) at the foot. It represents Dickens seated in a chair, and holding a portfolio. In the background a Punch-and-Judy performance is going on. The face has none of the delicacy and softness about it which are observable in the Maclise portrait. (Painted two years later.) It looks, however, more like the real young face of the older man as revealed in the last photograph taken. This portrait is very rare, and it is understood that it was withdrawn from publication soon after it appeared."

John Camden Hotten's "Charles Dickens, the Story of his Life."

Prints 25 cents. On Holland paper, 50 cents. Proofs on China paper, $1.00; on Japan paper, a limited number only, $1.50. First state, before inscription, 12 impressions only, $2.00.

112 Dickens, Charles. As he appeared at the St. James's Theater (November, 1845), in the character of Capt. Bobadil. From a Sketch by Kenny Meadows.

"Dickens had the title to be called a born comedian, the turn for it being in his very nature. His strength was rather in the vividness and variety of his assumptions than in the completeness, finish, or ideality he could give to any part of them. . . . . It enabled him to give in Bobadil, after a richly colored picture of bombastical extravagance and comic exaltation in the earlier scenes, a contrast in the later of tragical humility and abasement that had a wonderful effect."

Forster's "Life of Charles Dickens."

Prints on Holland paper, 50 cents. Proofs on China paper, $1.00; on Japan paper, a limited number only, $1.50.

113 Dickens, Charles. The last portrait taken, representing him as he appeared during his last reading at St. James' Hall, March 15th, 1870.

On that 15th of March, Dickens gave his "Farewell reading" at St. James' Hall. Long before the hour appointed the thoroughfare leading to the hall was blocked up, and when the doors were open, every seat was instantly taken, and many thousands of people were unable to obtain admittance. As if to assure his auditors that his powers were undiminished, he read with more than usual spirit and energy, and his voice was clear to the last. At the conclusion of the reading he bade his hearers farewell in words that were almost prophetic. "From these garish lights I vanish now for evermore, with a heartfelt, grateful, respectful, and affectionate farewell." Dickens died on the 9th of the following June.

120 Doggett, Thomas. Actor and Dramatic Poet. From a very rare contemporary Print.

Thomas Doggett was alternately mummer and player. Even when his London reputation as a comedian was at its prime he used to appear in a booth at Bartholomew Fair, parading the platform outside, and in an entertainment, embracing a play, dancing, singing, and conjuring, which lasted three-quarters of an hour. This print represents him dancing in the "hornpipe" of his day. At one time he had a booth of his own in the fair, and came from Drury Lane Theater to superintend its erection, and appear among the swings, and stalls, and shows, and bellowing showmen, in an old woman's petticoats and a red waistcoat. This was in 1702, when he was joint manager of the great patent theater. Here is one of his bills:

AT DOGGETT'S BOOTH, at HOSIER-LANE END,
During the time of
BARTHOLOMEW FAIR,
Will be presented a New Droll, called
THE DISTRESSED VIRGIN: or, THE UNNATURAL PARENTS, Being a True History of the FAIR MAID OF THE WEST: or, THE LOVING SISTERS.
With the Comical Travels of POOR TRUSTY IN SEARCH OF HIS MASTER'S DAUGHTER, AND HIS ENCOUNTER WITH THREE WITCHES.

Also, Variety of Comic Dances and Songs, with Scenes and Machines never seen before. VIVAT REGINA.

In 1704 the booth was called Parker and Doggett's. It was then usual for the theaters to close during the time of Bartholomew Fair, and managers of the highest position did not consider their dignity hurt by appearing as mummers on the Smithfield boards. Fielding himself was one of the partners in a great "theatrical booth" at this fair, where he produced "The Beggar's Opera," played by the same company that had just before been playing it at the Haymarket Theater. Doggett established the race for young watermen, which is rowed annually on the 1st of August, from London Bridge to Chelsea.

> From youth's Drosse, Mirth and wit; as thy pure mind
> Thought (like the Angels) nothing but the Praise

"I am afraid to think what I have done."

Macbeth, Act ii., Scene 2.

This portrait is curious, as showing the extraordinary manner in which Garrick dressed the part. Boaden says: "It is difficult to imagine how such a consummate artist as Garrick could play Richard the Third in what is called a shape, and yet act Macbeth, who, I think, murdered Duncan 440 years earlier, in a general's uniform of the reign of George II. However, the fact is unquestionable, and he so acted it all his life."

Meddle no more, thou busy informer!—It is in my power to make you curse the hour in which you dared to interfere with 170 Gwyn, Nell. Charles and James Beauclerk, sons of Nell Gwyn by Charles II. From a very rare contemporary Print by Robert White.

"She bore the King two sons, Charles and James Beauclerk. Charles, her eldest son, was born in Lincoln's Inn Fields, in 1670, a short time before his mother quitted the stage. The occasion of his being titled and acknowledged is characteristic. When the children of the Duchesses of Cleveland and Portsmouth had been dignified with titles, orders, and offices, Nell Gwyn naturally felt piqued that her sons, whose filial claims upon his Majesty were, at least, as well founded, should be passed over, and she took her own method of hinting her wishes to the King. One day, when his Majesty was present, and her eldest son was playing in the room, she called to him aloud, in a petulant tone, 'Come here, you little bastard!' The King, much shocked, reproved her. She replied, meekly, and with the most demure simplicity, that, 'indeed she was very sorry, but had no better name to give him, poor boy!' A few days after, this nameless young gentleman was created Baron of Heddington and Earl of Burford; and, in 1683, Duke of St. Albans, Registrar of the High Court of Chancery, and Grand Falconer of England. He inherited his mother's personal beauty, and served with great bravery under King William. Her younger son, Lord James Beauclerk, died in his childhood at Paris."—Mrs. Jameson's "Memoirs of the Beauties."

173 Gwyn, Nell. Charles II., Nell Gwyn and Evelyn (Scene —St. James's Park). From a Painting by E. M. Ward.

"Evelyn records a walk made on the 2d March, 1671, in which he attended him through St. James's Park, where he both saw and heard 'a familiar discourse between the King and Mrs. Nelly, as they called an impudent comedian, she looking out of her garden on a terrace on the top of the wall, and the King standing on the green walk under it.' The garden was attached to her house in Pall Mall, and the ground on which Nelly stood was a mount or raised terrace, of which a portion may still be seen under the park-wall of Marlborough House. Of this scene, at which Evelyn tells us he was 'heartily sorry,' my friend, Mr. Ward, has painted a picture of surprising truthfulness and beauty."—Cunningham's "Story of Nell Gwyn."

182 Gwyn, Nell. Nell Gwyn's Looking-glass, in the Collection of Sir Page Dicks, of Port Hall.

This glass is now in the possession of Sir Page Dicks, of Port Hall. It bears the likeness of Nell Gwyn and King Charles, which are modeled in wax; and also the supporters, or crest which Nell assumed, namely, the lion and the leopard. The whole is curiously worked in colored glass beads, and the figures, with the dresses, made to project in very high relief; indeed, they are merely attached to the groundwork. In the upper compartment is Charles in his state dress; and the bottom one, that of Nell Gwyn, in her court dress.

183 Hackett, James H. As Nimrod Wildfire. From the Original Painting by A. Andrews, in the Collection of Thomas J. McKee, Esq.

"Hackett's first success as an actor of Yankee parts was in 1828, in his own alteration of the farce, by George Colman the younger, "Who Wants a Guinea?" into "Jonathan in England," in which the original British Solomon Gundy is changed into an American Solomon Swap,—a rather high-handed conversion, which greatly excited Colman's ire when, as examiner of plays, he was called upon to license, for performance in London, this perversion of his own handiwork. Five or six years later Hackett repeated the attempt, playing Paul Pry in Yankee dialect!—surely one of the most curious experiments in the history of the drama. He did not, however, confine himself to these alterations, but sought diligently for wholly original American parts; and, after two or three ventures, he made a great success, in 1831, as Colonel Nimrod Wildfire, in a comedy called "The Lion of the West," written for him by one of the foremost figures in our literature then, although now well-nigh forgotten—James K. Paulding. The part suited him so well that, when in England afterward, he had a sequel to it written by Bayle Bernard, called "The Kentuckians," in which he, of course, appeared as Colonel Nimrod."—J. Brander Matthews, "The American on the Stage."

185 Haines, Joe. In the Character of a Quack Doctor. From a rare contemporary Print.

Joe Haines, of all the famous mummers, is perhaps the most famous. He was born in 1638 and died in 1701. The number of the anecdotes relating to his career, both as a mummer and as a comic actor of eminence, is legion. They crop up in all sorts of holes and corners of half-forgotten books, and they have pamphlets exclusively their own. As Master Joseph Haines, playing with Nell Gwyn and Mr. Hart (her first lover), as the learned Dr. Haines, puffing his own ridiculous pills, powders, and draughts, for the certain cure of all known and unknown diseases, as Count Haynes imposing upon the miraculous and trustful, or as plain Joe Haynes or Heynes, dramatic author, epilogue and prologue writer, and actor, or as "Waltho Van Clutterbank, high German wonder-working doctor and dentrifricator," displaying the medals awarded to him by foreign governments, he is the hero of a variety of vagabond adventures both at home and abroad. He is said to have been a good-looking man and greatly admired by the ladies, a veritable Baron Munchausen in lying —another Sheridan in his schemes for befooling trades-people, getting into their books, and escaping from the bailiffs sent to arrest him. He died on Friday, April 4th, 1701, and a broadside, with a black border, mourned his end in an elegy published by "J. B., near the Strand." I quote one line, which J. B. ought to have regarded as personal:

"Joe Haines is dead, and left his Ass behind."

187 Hall, Jacob. Famous Rope-Dancer. From a Painting by Van Oost.

Jacob Hall was a famous mummer when the lords and ladies of the Court mingled with the mob at fair-time. Mr. Pepys tells how on the 29th of August, 1668, he found the play-house so dull that for relief he went to Bartholomew's Fair with his wife in a coach, and that they there witnessed 'Jacob Hall's dancing of the ropes, a thing worth seeing and mightily followed.' He is described as 'a pretty man,' who became the Merry Monarch's rival in the affections of Lady Castlemaine, from whom he received a salary. Pepys saw the handsome famous rope-dancer again at Southwark fair, and got into conversation with him by going to the tavern he and his fellow-mummers frequented. He gave them a bottle or two of wine, and remarks of Hall, 'He seems a mighty strong man.' When Hall got into trouble for setting up his booth at Charing Cross in the midst of the people of rank and fashion, the tipstaff committed him to prison. But his lady patron's interest at Court procured his release, and he proceeded, despite the tipstaff's protest, to finish the erection of his booth and commence performances, which drew so many thieves and rogues to the place that the inhabitants complained to the Chief-Justice, who said this mummer-lover of Lady Castlemaine's was a nuisance to the neighborhood.

256 Ken, Thomas. Another Portrait with fac-simile autograph.

This learned and pious dignitary of the Church of England was born at Berkhamstead, in Hertfordshire, in 1637. His conscientious propriety of conduct and unyielding morality found favor even with the licentious Charles II. On one occasion, when the Court was visiting Winchester, the king's "harbinger," whom we may suppose was an officer of the household, marked Ken's residence, which he held in right of his prebend, for the use of Nell Gwyn. But the doctor's fearless heart at once prompted him to vindicate the holiness of his office. He absolutely refused her admittance, declaring that a woman of ill-repute ought not to be endured in the house of a clergyman, especially the king's chaplain. This must have excited no small surprise among the courtiers, but as he was peremptory, she was forced to seek other lodgings. He could not enter into the little worldly considerations that so often outweigh the clear dictates of conscience. His was no false or partial rule of conduct. The same zeal which afterwards moved him to resist the tyrannous encroachments of the perjured James at once made him reject Nell Gwyn, though it should expose him to the king's resentment. He had, in his measure, the holy courage of the Baptist, to reprove adultery even in a palace; but very different was his reward. So far from being offended, Charles appears to have admired the Christian boldness of his chaplain. Cunningham says: "He knew that Ken was right; appreciated his motives; and one of his last acts was to make the person by whom he was so properly admonished Bishop of Bath and Wells."

280 L'Overture, Toussaint. From a scarce contemporary Print.

"I would call him Napoleon, but Napoleon made his way to empire over broken oaths and through a sea of blood. This man never broke his word. 'No retaliation' was his great motto and the rule of his life; and the last words uttered to his son in France were these: 'My boy, you will one day go back to St. Domingo; forget that France murdered your father!' I would call him Cromwell, but Cromwell was only a soldier, and the state he founded went down with him into his grave. I would call him Washington, but the great Virginian held slaves. This man risked his empire rather than permit the slave trade in the humblest village of his dominions. Fifty years hence, when truth gets a hearing, the Muse of History will put Phocion for the Greek, and Brutus for the Roman, Hampden for England, Lafayette for France, choose Washington as the bright consummate flower of our civilization, then, dipping her pen in the sunlight, will write in the clear blue, above them all, the name of the soldier, the statesman, the martyr, TOUSSAINT L'OVERTURE.

325 Pepys, Samuel. Author of the "Diary." Etched by Samuel Hollyer and A. Barry, from the Painting by Hales in the National Collection.

"To Hales', and there sat till almost quite dark upon working my gowne, which I tried to be drawn in; an Indian gowne. . . . . To Hales', where there was nothing found to be done more to my picture, but the musique, which now pleases me mightily, it being painted true." —Pepys's Diary.

"It is a curious illustration of the way pictures are lost and found, that the portrait of Pepys, taken in his hired Indian gown, and with the music of his 'Beauty retire,' introduced in the picture by Hales, was very nearly lost to the world. It was included in a sale of pictures, described as the 'Portrait of a Musician.' It might have been sold as such, and its identity altogether lost, had not, fortunately, Mr. Peter Cunningham, learned in the literary and pictorial lore of the 17th and 18th centuries, seen it, known it, and bought it for a mere song, and it is gratifying to be able now to add, that the picture may be seen, as the property of the nation, in the National Portrait Gallery."— Tiffins's "Gossip about Portraits."

This most interesting portrait of Pepys has been etched by Samuel Hollyer and Auguste Barry from a photograph taken by special permission of the British Government, from the original oil-painting by Hales in the National Portrait-Gallery, London. It is a most carefully executed copy of what may be considered an actual fac-simile of the original picture, as far as sun and light can give it to us. Messrs. Hollyer and Barry's print is altogether of a different character to the inaccurate wood-engraving of the same portrait which appears in the first edition of Cunningham's 'Story of Nell Gwyn.' This wood-cut was executed in a hurried manner by a draughtsman who, at one fell swoop of his careless pencil, made Pepys twenty years younger than Hales' painting represents him to have been. It is unfortunate for art, and the lovers of engraving and literature, that this incorrect portrait has recently, in an etching just published, again been imposed upon collectors as a genuine portrait of Pepys.

326 Pepys, Mrs. As St. Catherine. From the Original, by Hales.

"Mr. Hales began my wife's portrait in the posture we saw one of my Lady Peters, like a St Katherine. While he painted, Knipp, and Mercer, and I sang . . . . . To Hales', and there saw my wife sit; and I do like her picture mightily, and very like it will be, and a brave piece of work. But he do complain that her nose hath cost him as much work as another's face, and he hath done it finely indeed. . . . . To Hales', where I met my wife and people; and do find the picture, above all things, a most pretty picture, and mighty like my wife: and I asked him his price: he says £14, and I think he do deserve it."—Pepys's Diary.

327. Phillips, William. From a rare contemporary Print.

William Phillips was a famous merry-andrew in the palmy days of mummery, when fairs abounded, and everybody combined for their support. "His pleasant humours, various adventures, cheats, frolics, and cunning designs," figure amongst the Harleian MSS. (5961), under the title of "A New Fairing for the Merrily Disposed; or, the Comical History of the Famous Merry-Andrew—W. Phill." He was a musician, a dancer, a famous orator on the outside platform, &c., and there is some reason for supposing that he was the author of a tragedy published in 1698, called The Revengeful Queen, and another called Alcamenes and Menelippa.

359 Schiller, Frederick. At Carlsbad. From a Pen Drawing by J. C. Reinhart.

This print represents the poet in the twenty-third year of his age, and as he appeared when, during a sojourn at Carlsbad, he joined some young friends on a mountain excursion. The whole party were mounted on donkeys. The dreamy expression of Schiller's countenance is admirably reflected in this sketch, which would seem to have been taken whilst the poet was thoughtfully gazing on some point of the picturesque scenery, the beauty of which riveted his interest.

Reinhart, who died in the year 1847, enjoyed the friendship of both Goethe and Schiller. He was born in 1761, and consequently was just two years younger than the latter. They were much together in the earlier part of their lives. Reinhart's landscape paintings are highly esteemed by his countrymen. They are characterized by remarkable freedom of handling and transparency of color. Reinhart possessed great talent for etching, and he etched some views of Rome and its neighborhood, which are highly prized in Germany. One of his finest etchings, representing a storm, is dedicated to his friend Schiller.

"The printer's proffit not my pride,
Hath this Idea sinify'd,
For he pusht the merrie pay
And Mr. Gaywood made it gay."

Though this obscure author would have us believe that his play was published and his head engraved more to gratify the public than himself, he seems to have had his share of the vanity which adheres to human nature. The engraving of his head was a fortunate circumstance for his memory; he will be remembered by it when his play and poems are utterly forgotten.

398 Turkish Rope-Dancer. Fac-simile of a rare Print by W. Hollar.

> "Going to London with some company we stept in to see the famous Rope-dancer, called 'The Turk.' I saw even to my astonishment ye agility with which he perform'd; he walked barefooted, taking hold by his toes only, of a rope almost perpendicular, and without so much as touching it with his hands; he daunc'd, blindfold on ye high rope, and with a boy of 12 years tied to one of his feet about 25 foote beneath him, dangling as he daunc'd, yet he mov'd as nimbly as if he had been a feather. Lastly he stood on his head on ye top of a very high mast, daunc'd on a small rope that was very slack, and finally flew down the perpendicular on his breast, his head foremost, his legs and arms extended, with divers other activities."—Evelyn.

400 Turner, J. M. W. From the Original by George Dance. Painted, 1800.

> "He (Turner) sat to Dance for a portrait published in 1800, when Turner was R. A., and twenty-five years old. This portrait is one of a series of Academician portraits painted by George Dance. It shows a handsome young man, with rather large features, a full prominent nose, a fine strong-willed chin, and a rather sensual mouth, the lower lip of which is fleshy, and the upper lip beautifully curved. The eyebrow is arched, and the eyelids long, presenting a great depth between the eye and the eyebrow. The forehead is full, but rather receding, and is covered with a stray wisp of hair, as Turner always kept it. The hair is close and thick, and rather stubborn looking, is long behind, and tied with a ribbon. He wears a white cravat, the ends of which bulge out in front of his waistcoat. The cape of his coat is of immense width, and the lapels are thrown back in a careless, but still rather cavalier way. Indeed, in this portrait, unless Dance's pencil has flattered, Turner looks a frank, handsome-featured young man, of genius, as far as appearance goes. The portrait might be as well that of a young general or a young statesman, for the expression is at once winning and commanding."— Thornbury's "Life of J. M. W. Turner."

Prints on Holland paper, 50 cents. Proofs on China paper, $1.00; on Japan paper, a limited number only, $1.50.

401 Turner, J. M. W. From a Sketch made by Sir John Gilbert, at the British Institution, 1841.

"Mr. John Gilbert took a sketch of Turner on one of the varnishing days of the Exhibition at the British Institution (1841), to which he contributed. Turner's picture was not finished, for latterly he finished them always on the walls. Mounted on a box, the little squab man was scumbling in the rays of the sun, which in the exact center of the picture (says Mr. Gilbert), projected like the boss of an ancient shield. Mr. Gilbert watched him as he worked, and took a sketch, which he afterward from memory elaborated. This sketch (now etched for the first time) represents, very humorously and vigorously, the awkward, untidy dress of the painter; and the swab of a handkerchief hanging from the side pocket of his tail-coat, the large, almost Jewish nose, the loose slovenly trowsers, and the eagle eyes, are not easily forgotten."— Thornbury's "Life of J. M. W. Turner."

Prints on Holland paper, 50 cents. Proofs on China paper, $1.00; on Japan paper, a limited number only, $1.50.

402 Turner, J. M. W. From the same, head and bust only. Prints, 25 cents. On Holland paper, 50 cents. Proofs on China paper, 75 cents; on Japan paper, $1.00.

403 Turner, J. M. W. From a Sketch made by Count D'Orsay, 1851.

"The Count evidently drew Turner, not from any admiration of his genius, of which he probably understood nothing, but as being a character, and old-fashioned in dress and manner. Some of Turner's friends think this a base caricature, while others regard it as, after all, the best likeness extant. I regard it as, at least, an admirable record of his costume and attitude. His enormous, loose, large-buttoned dress coat, with the square wide tails and the outside pockets, are very characteristic; so are his white cravat and frilled shirt; as are the meager dancing-shoes, and the rudely made trowsers. I like, too, the grim, listening air with which, as he stands near the piano, he stirs round his cup of tea. But whether he ever wore that woe-begone misery aspect, I cannot say, though the amateur artist has certainly giving the face a look of declining health and vitality. The nose sharpens, the cheeks sink, the mouth falls in, the eye is feeble, even the hair is lean and sickly. Death is very near at hand with the great artist, and is watching him even now in that room echoing with music and sparkling with lights."— Thornbury's "Life of J. M. W. Turner."

408 Unger, William. Celebrated German Etcher.

"It is difficult, in an age which has produced half a dozen artist engravers of the very highest rank, to say which of them is king; but if any critic were to give the supreme station to Unger he might maintain his decision by the argument that this artist has etched more plates of uniformly good quality than any one else, whilst a few of his finest works, taken separately, will bear comparison with the finest of those other distinguished interpreters of pictures whom we have already studied." —Hamerton's "Etching and Etchers."

This "Triumvirate of Methodist Clergymen" was etched by Kay when Wesley visited Scotland for the last time, in 1790. The three gentlemen are portrayed as they appeared in company, while returning from the Castle Hill, where Mr. Wesley had delivered a sermon. The inscription reads: "Ninety-four years have I sojourned on this earth, endeavoring to do good;" but the artist must have been misled as to the age of the patriarchal preacher, as he was then only in his eighty-seventh year.

"A. B. Durand is the acknowledged head of the profession in America. A fine draughtsman, and with thorough command of the burin, his plates are executed with the finest feeling and in the most artistic manner. . . Contemporary European art furnishes no better specimens of the higher walks of the profession. . . . His portraits are truthful in character and expression, and admirably executed. That of Charles Carroll excited much surprise abroad at the time of its publication, as being the work of an American."—W. S. Baker, "American Engravers and their Works."

Folio, 16×11. Prints, $1.50; on India paper, $2.00.

462 Angling. "Fly Fishing." From a water-color drawing by A. Cooper, R. A.

Auguste Barry etched the above from the painting by A. Cooper, the well-known English Royal Academician, whose specialty is sporting subjects. It was published as much for the portfolio as for the illustration of Walton and Cotton's "Complete Angler," a work which has been described as one of the most "charming pastorals" in the English language. The author of the "Essays of Elia," writing to Coleridge, asks him: "Among all your quaint readings, did you ever light upon Walton's 'Complete Angler'?"

and then adds: "It breathes the very spirit of innocence, purity, and simplicity of heart; there are many choice old verses interspersed in it; it would christianize every discordant, angry passion."

No work will stand extra illustration better than the "Complete Angler." This plate, representing a gentle fisherman whipping a running stream for its finny denizens, should find a place in every piscatorial art collection.

469 Cruikshank. His last Political Caricature.

"The Leader of the Parisian Blood-Red Republic, or the Infernal Fiend! for no deeds more fiendish were ever perpetrated in the history of man than those committed and caused by the 'Red Republicans' in the late revolt. It was these ignorant drunken brutes who, in a great measure, brought about the war with Germany, which has ended in the dishonor of their country and in tens of thousands of their fellow countrymen being killed or wounded, and also the death or injury of many women and children; and, by their insane attempt to hold Paris and rule France, they have further caused the slaughter of thousands of men, women, and children, as well as the destruction of their city and many of its treasures, and, by misleading women and driving them mad with drink, have caused them to act in such a way that the enraged soldiers, in their fury, have shot down and slaughtered women of Paris, young and old, as if they were wild beasts!!! As there is a 'Red Republican' party in this country, some national means should be taken to show these mistaken men that such plans if carried out would not only destroy the laws of civilized society, but also be subverting the laws of nature. And therefore a law should be passed to make it criminal for such insane principles to be advocated."

Designed, etched, and published by George Cruikshank (in his 79th year), June, 1871.

Folio, 15 × 11. Colored by hand, $1.50.

470 Bibliomania. "The Book-worm." From the original painting, by Spitzwig.

This etching is equally well adapted for illustrating either an octavo or a quarto volume of a work of a bibliomaniacal character. Spitzwig's painting, from which it has been copied, is one of the best known of its class. An old gentleman is standing on the top rung of a seven-step foot-ladder. He is not only surrounded by the well-worn tomes of past generations, but he seems to have actually incorporated them into his very being. His brain is running wild in monomaniac fancy free, while devouring the contents of the volume which he holds to his very nose and in his right hand. His left hand tenaciously grasps a folio. Under his arm is yet another, which seems gradually slipping from him, and his knees embrace still another, as if fearful some literary point would be overlooked by their quaintly garbed master. In one corner of the room is a terrestrial globe, possibly a graceful allusion to the author of "The Cosmos," of whom "The Book-worm" is said to be a likeness. Undoubtedly the physiognomy has a very striking resemblance to Alexander von Humboldt.

The original painting was sold some years ago at Clinton Hall, New-York City, by George A. Leavitt & Co., who may be well called the Christie & Mansons of America.

483 Landseer. "The Cavalier's Pets—Charles II. Spaniels." Etched by Samuel Hollyer and A. Barry, after Sir Edwin Landseer.

This plate aptly illustrates Rochester's trite lines on the "Merrie Monarch":

"His very dog on council-board,
Sits grave, as wise as any lord."

It represents two King Charles spaniels, reclining on a table between one of "Old Rowley's" hats and a spur. Painted by the great animal painter, Sir Edwin Landseer, at the zenith of his art life, this creation of his brush was never equaled. The etching by Messrs. S. Hollyer and Auguste Barry is well suited for insertion in Cunningham's Life of Nell Gwyn, the saucy orange-girl, the favorite court beauty and actress.

Folio 15×10. Artist's Proofs on India paper, signed, $10.00.

"The 'best portrait of Longfellow' has been asked for a great many times in the past year, and never furnished. There was no really adequate engraved portrait of the most popular of American poets. This one promises to come nearer satisfying those who knew what kind of a man Longfellow was than any of its predecessors. It is engraved in pure line by Charles Burt, the principal engraver of vignettes and portraits for the Treasury Department at Washington. Mr. Burt's portrait represents Mr. Longfellow as he appeared in his seventieth year — white-haired, full-bearded, his face already showing a little of the emaciation and a great deal of the serenity of age, sitting in a reflective attitude, and resting the jaw lightly on the right hand, but looking full at you. It is not in the least an idealized portrait. In fact, its basis is a photograph which the family liked; but it is a faithful representation of the man in his every-day guise — open, gentle, kindly, as his family and friends saw him; and the engraver's work deserves to rank with the best work in line we have had for years. Five years ago, on the introduction of the New-York Historical Society, and with reference to this portrait, Mr. Burt first visited Mr. Longfellow:"—New York Tribune, March 8, 1883.

491 Print Collecting. "The Connoisseurs." Etched by Samuel Hollyer and A. Barry from the original by P. C. Silardi.

This etching, after P. C. Silardi's celebrated painting, represents three bon-vivants clad in seventeenth century costume, admiring some rare or choice example of the burin. Two of the connoisseurs, in their enthusiasm over the etched lines of the Dürer or Rembrandt held in the correct manner from left to right corner by the seated dilletante, have forgotten the good old crusted port with which their glasses are filled, but which they nevertheless grasp in their hands. Their features are a perfect study of admiration and contentment, and would have pleased the soul of Lavater. They are no impecunious collectors, for they are surrounded by the evidences of wealth, and an open portfolio exhibiting other rare gems of engraving lies before them.

4to, 9×6. Prints on Holland paper, 50 cts. Proofs on China paper, $1.00. On Japan paper, a limited number only, $1.50. Proofs, first state, before inscription, 25 impressions only, $2.00.

492 Raleigh. The Introduction of Tobacco into England by Sir Walter Raleigh. From the original by W. R. Buss.

This Etching is a graphic representation of the well-known anecdote narrated by Fairholt in his "Tobacco, its History and Associations," of "the accident related as happening to him [Sir Walter Raleigh] when he took a private pipe, and occasioned his servant to cast the ale over him as the smoke induced him to fear his master was on fire."

Here we have Raleigh frightening his cellarer into a belief that the great discoverer was a second Friar Bacon or Cornelius Agrippa. We can imagine the awe-struck physiognomy of the menial, the shivering tremor of his limbs and the aspen quivering of his legs, as he contemplated, in mediæval horror, the wizard navigator eating fire and belching smoke like a furnace. Doubtless he thought the evil one was getting rid of Sir Walter by spontaneous combustion. And the solid satisfaction of Raleigh, absorbing the soothing nicotine into his every nerve, reclining back in delicious pleasure in his good easy-chair, surrounded by his books, and thinking over the thrilling adventures in the transatlantic El Dorado, where he discovered and gave two blessings to Europe, for which he deserves the thanks of posterity — the mealy, crummy potato and the entrancing, voluptuous pipe.

Aubrey tells us Raleigh was "faithful to the end" in his love of the gentle weed. These are the words of the chronicler: "He tooke a pipe of tobacco a little before he went to the scaffolde, which some female persons were scandalized at; but I think 'twas well and properly done to settle his spirits."

500 Turner. The Fighting Téméraire tugged to her last berth to be broken up, 1838.

"The Téméraire picture was exhibited by Turner at the Royal Academy in 1839. The subject was suggested to the painter by Stanfield. In 1838 Turner was with Stanfield and a party of brother artists on one of those holiday excursions in which he so delighted, probably to end with white-bait and champagne at Greenwich. It was at these times that Turner talked and joked his best, snatching now and then a moment to print on his quick brain some tone of sky, some gleam of water, some sprinkling light of oar, some glancing sunshine cross-barring a sail. Suddenly there moved down upon the artists' boat the grand old vessel that had been taken prisoner at the Nile and that led the van at Trafalgar. She loomed pale and ghostly, and was being towed to her last moorings at Deptford by a little, fiery, puny steam-tug. 'There's a fine subject, Turner,' said Stanfield. So Turner painted it, and it proved one of his most poetical pictures. Mr. Ruskin considers this the last picture Turner executed with his entire and perfect powers."

506 "A Bone of Contention" in three parts. Part one, "Felonious Intentions." Part two, "Theft Frustrated." Part three, "Virtue Triumphant." Etched by Samuel Hollyer and A. Barry From the originals by S. T. Dadd.

"A Bone of Contention" gives us some humorous, though somewhat bellicose fun. It is in three sessions, each representing a different stage in the proceedings, which are supposed to occur between a sulky-looking English bull-dog and a greedy and impudent magpie. In the first act, "Felonious Intentions," we see the hungry and talkative magpie earnestly meditating a raid upon a bone which the canine holds under his right paw. The magpie's perky head and the bull-dog's resolute glare indicate coming trouble. And in the second act, "Theft Frustrated," we have it. The magpie has succeeded in its fell design, but alas! a terrible penalty has befallen the robber bird. The bull-dog has arisen in the majesty of justice and captured the thief, who, in mid-air, and surrounded with a cloud of dust, is vociferously cawing for dear life, with the amateur policeman triumphantly shaking the garrulous bird's tail, which he has between his fangs. The third act exhibits "Virtue Triumphant." Mr. Bull-dog to the fore, with the bone securely held in his jaws, looking happy and victorious, while cowering by the wall is the wicked bird, whose scattered feathers mark the scene of the fight.

507 F. O. C. Darley's Illustrations to Washington Irving's "Rip Van Winkle."

These six spirited outline illustrations to Washington Irving's "Rip Van Winkle" vividly present in line engraving what Joe Jefferson has brought home to us in his dramatic delineation of the sleepy vagabond of the Catskills. They are worthy to be placed beside the text of Irving's charming stories of the American Rhine, and of which Chambers' "Cyclopedia of English Literature" states: "His [Irving's] stories of Rip Van Winkle and Sleepy Hollow are, perhaps, the finest pieces of original fictitious writing that this country has produced, next to the works of Scott." F. O. C. Darley never did better work than his six-chapter story in line of "Rip Van Winkle."

8vo. The set of six plates, $2.00. Proofs on China paper, $3.50. Proofs on Japan paper, $5.00.

508 The Presidents, from Washington to Hayes. Nineteen Portraits in one group. Engraved by Samuel Hollyer, from the best authenticated originals.
